Forming Multi-sector Collaborative

What?

A multi-sector collaborative is a group of organizations from different sectors with the same goal. Pushing aside geopolitical concerns and competition, collaborative groups come together to achieve a common objective. These groups enable members to embrace the power and benefits of shared aims and priorities, emphasizing collaborative effort, impact and success.

Why?

Create a multi-sector collaborative to:

- comply with reaccreditation standards;
 - meet federal and state community health needs assessment requirements;
 - advance health equity;
 - solidify community partnerships for value-based purchasing and integrated care delivery;
 - harness the power of the collective impact model to help advance regional goals, especially in the area of chronic disease;
 - uncover unusual but productive partnerships that expand reach across sectors; and
 - improve the health of your region's population.

When?

Forming a multi-sector collaborative takes time and diligent follow-up. There is no right or wrong time to get started. Embrace an opportunity to connect with individuals from other sectors whenever it happens. Keep in mind that this will be a time-consuming initiative that could take months.

HELPFUL TIP:

Ask yourself questions that require you to think outside of the box.

How?

Formulate a succinct pitch using these steps:

- know your potential collaborator organization's mission and needs;
- reinforce each collaborator's vital role in the collective effort;
- remind them that all sectors have areas that overlap;
- communicate often that joint success stems from each individual's success — and everyone can take credit;
- emphasize that the backbone entity takes the lead in terms of focus, coordination and streamlining efforts — meaning less burden on individual collaborators; and
- all sectors contribute to the health of the community. For example, think of how providers now recognize the role of social determinants of health in patient outcomes.
